[Excerpt from interview of Peter McCausland, Executive Chairman of Airgas, Inc., by Jim Cramer, anchor of Mad Money, aired on July 24, 2014 beginning at 6:30 p.m., Eastern Standard Time]

McCausland:

Well, I think, you know the process that you go through in a hostile or in an activist situation, is probably a good process and it really does test you. It makes you look very hard and the board's got to make some really tough decisions. We got through it, because we had 16-thousand amazing associates, who put in four great quarters, got the analysts to cover us again, the analysts put out target prices that were higher than the bid, and then of course the second factor would be we spent a lot of money with bankers and lawyers. But, the third factor and the really important one, was we had a staggered board and a poison pill and that prevented Air Products from committing grand theft company, as you called it, one time. And you know we have on our proxy this year, a proposal to de-stagger our board. It's the third time it's been on it. It only got slightly over 50-percent last time. But, I can't understand how anyone would vote for that in the Airgas context. In as much as that staggered board saved our shareholders over $2 billion

Cramer:

That's the way to look at it.

McCausland:

Yes.

Cramer

I mean to me, I'm looking at the value creation that you did at Airgas. The value creation that David Pyott has done at Allergan, the value creation that Jeff Bewkes has done at Time Warner, they're clearly able to bring out more value than these other companies that don't really know their industries.

McCausland:

Well there's instant value and there's long term value. That's the difference

Cramer:

And which is bigger? Well you're a living example, right?

McCausland:

Well, I tend to think long term and we have a record 19-percent per year compounded to our shareholders, since going public.

Cramer:

There you go. That says everything.
