It is hard to imagine how Cyanotech's board of directors could show itself to be less interested in good governance practices for a public company:

With its recently-filed proxy statement, Cyanotech's board has renominated Michael Davis to serve another term on the board, even though Davis has been accused of serious improprieties, some of which have exposed the Company to the potential of significant liability.

Not only has Cyanotech's board acted to renominate someone who has created, at a minimum, a very strong appearance of impropriety, it has deliberately proceeded with the nomination before finishing its own internal investigation of Davis' conduct, an investigation Meridian was told would be completed by August 2.

Having been alerted to the likelihood of an undisclosed group comprised of Davis and the Rudolph Steiner Foundation, Cyanotech's board caused the Company's proxy statement – a document that is specifically designed and intended to inform a company's stockholders of their respective voting rights – to be filed despite the potential that such filing could soon be shown to contain material misstatements of fact, with such misstatements giving rise to new claims against the Company.

Prior to causing the Company to file its proxy statement, Cyanotech's board of directors engaged in a dialog with Meridian during which it heard from both Meridian and Meridian's legal counsel as to why it was unwise and unnecessary to proceed with the proxy statement filing prior to it receiving the results of the internal investigation. Cyanotech's board proceeded with the filing anyway – very much on notice that such action would likely be viewed as yet another breach of the board's fiduciary duties. Cyanotech's board took such action, Meridian believes, on the advice of the Company's corporate counsel, which counsel was placed in that role by Davis, over the objections of Cyanotech's then-management team. Cyanotech's then-management team argued such counsel would be conflicted in its loyalties due to its prior role of representing Davis personally.

In addition to questioning the loyalty of Cyanotech's corporate counsel, we must now begin to question in whose interest Cyanotech's board is acting. We must raise this question because, as discussed below, there appears to be no party other than Davis that benefits from the rush to file the proxy statement. The Company's board renominated Davis before it had the results of the internal investigation and Cyanotech's stockholders will, we can presume, be asked to vote their shares without benefit of such information.

The board's haste in filing the proxy statement becomes even more suspect when considered in context with upcoming litigation deadlines. Cyanotech requested an extension of the time allowed to file its answer to the Meridian lawsuit until August 26, 2016. As disclosed in the proxy statement, the board set the date of the annual meeting of stockholders for August 25, 2016. By filing the proxy statement now and setting the date of the stockholder meeting before the date its answer is due, Cyanotech may be trying to hold the annual meeting before it is required to respond to the allegations in the Meridian lawsuit, when its answer may require it to make damaging admissions. It is important to note, however, that if the board is currently aware of adverse information and failed to disclose that information in its proxy statement, the Company may be liable for additional securities law violations and the board may be liable for additional breaches of fiduciary duty.

When Meridian delivered its letter to Cyanotech's board on May 6, 2016 describing a long pattern of reporting and corporate governance violations attributable to Davis, Meridian believed it was possible that the other board members were unaware of these issues. In any case, Meridian believed that by placing the board on notice of the suspected reporting and corporate governance violations, the board members would quickly take action to distance themselves and the Company from Davis. Now, clearly aware of the issues surrounding Davis, the actions of Cyanotech's outside board members have been the opposite of what Meridian expected. The admonition to avoid not just impropriety but the appearance of impropriety does not appear to carry much weight within Cyanotech's board room.

Perhaps this board's actions can be explained by the surprising ways in which Davis has been able to wrap himself around the control mechanisms of the Company. This begins with the control group Davis has apparently created by giving Cyanotech shares and money to acquire Cyanotech shares to the Rudolph Steiner Foundation (RSF) and then persuading RSF to hold its large underperforming stake in the Company for far longer than would seem prudent for such an organization. At the board level, Davis has been made not just Chairman, but also Chairman of the Nominating and Governance Committee. From this position, Davis can exert substantial influence on the composition of the board and pursue his apparent preference for directors with no prior public company board experience. Davis himself has no other public company board experience which generally makes him a poor choice to head the committee in charge of corporate governance practices. Davis is also on the audit committee despite Sarbanes-Oxley Act and Nasdaq rules that disqualify him from serving on this committee. Until recently, Davis also served on the company's compensation committee.

It is extremely unusual for someone to serve on all three of a public company's required standing committees and Davis used these positions, together with his controlling stockholder group, to influence the Company's operations. Since orchestrating the forced resignation of the Company's prior CEO, Davis has directed operating decisions including those relating to strategy, budgeting and employee roles and responsibilities. Meridian cannot help but be pessimistic about the Company's prospects while under the continuing control of Davis.

Davis has been on the Company's board since March 2003 and its Chairman since 2011. As shown in the graphic below, Cyanotech's common stock has performed very poorly over Davis' 13 plus year tenure on the board, returning a stock performance of -45%. This compares to the Nasdaq composite which is up 278% over the same period.

Looking at this track-record, Meridian cannot understand why Cyanotech's board wants to renominate Davis at all, much less do so with such haste that it exposes them to personal liability. The only reasonable explanation Meridian can find is that the directors feel they have no choice in the matter – that they see their four board votes somehow holding less authority in the Company than Davis' one board vote.

Meridian believes this situation must change. As explained in its May 6, 2016 letter and its Schedule 13D filings, Meridian fears that Cyanotech, under Davis' control, is currently failing on a strategic level, an operations level and a governance level. Cyanotech has great growth potential and Meridian believes it can deliver outsized investor returns if run properly. First and foremost, this requires the Company to make the process changes necessary to increase its astaxanthin production. The Company has been describing its continuing problems in this area for almost two years. In late 2015 and again in early 2016, Meridian made offers, through the Company's prior CEO, to provide capital to help advance the production process changes. Meridian offered to provide capital in whatever form would best suit Cyanotech – equity, debt or joint-venture (Meridian purchasing equipment for use by the Company). Cyanotech's board never responded to Meridian – instead, the board removed the CEO that forwarded Meridian's offers of assistance.

Davis' actions suggest he is more concerned with maintaining and exercising his personal control over the Company than he is in the Company pursuing its opportunities, achieving its potential and increasing stockholder value. Having surrounded himself with a stockholder group, a board of directors and a corporate counsel that he is able to control, Davis appears to be maneuvering around the internal investigation in order secure himself another year on Cyanotech's board, a position from which he cannot be removed without a two-thirds vote of all the Company's stockholders. The internal investigation will soon be completed, however, and Meridian believes its findings will make it increasingly difficult for anyone to claim he is unaware of Davis's improper conduct and to pretend that Cyanotech's board is pursuing proper public company governance and acting in the best interests of all Cyanotech stockholders.

Meridian is always interested in hearing from fellow stockholders and has created a special email address to help Cyanotech stockholders contact us.
